It is always nice to end the review with an interesting image. I took this one for another article that I'm stirring up but perhaps people would find it interesting to see the keyboard interacting with the Xbox in this review too. Silvery color of the keyboard goes nicely together with the Crystal edition don't you think?

Conclusion

PROS

- Silent

I was bit surprised that I liked this keyboard so much. I've always wanted a keyboard that is bit similar to keyboards found on laptops/notebooks; short travel distance on keys when pressed and similar overall feel. Now that they have taken these characteristics and stretched the layout to resemble a regular keyboard, I was sold.

I would like to remind you that this same keyboard is also available without lights if you don't like them. On the otherhand you can always turn them off by using F10 + Esc keycombo. For us that have used keyboards for several years, it is not necessary to look at the keys at the same time we are typing. In that sense there is no point on having lights on the keyboard in the first place. But when you look at the computer peripheral and modding supply markets these days you'll notice that everything is not about usability any more. It is ok for a product to look nice too. Modders have made their setups to look nice for years and it is only a good thing that manufacturers start to realize the potential of these "designer" products.

Keyboards are items that should be bought only after you have tested it in the store etc. Some people love laptop type keyboards but other will find the natural line better for them. When manufacturers broke the mold few years back and started to produce these different types of keyboards it has been interesting time to find a perfect keyboard to use. Perhaps this 6300CL from BTC is the one for you?
